SPEECH DISORDERS

In addition to aphasia, a variety of speech disorders are frequently encountered, including impaired articulation (dysarthria), impaired melody of speech, impaired voice volume, mutism, and perseveration.

Hypophonía

Decreased voice volume (hypophonía) may reflect respiratory or airway difficulties, diseases of the basal ganglia such as Parkinson's disease, or psychiatric disease (hysteria, malingering, depression, or schizophrenia). Aphonía is a complete loss of voice. Aphonía patients may be unable to phonate for a variety of reasons, including respiratory difficulties; paralysis of respiratory muscles; abnormalities of the tongue, larynx, and pharynx; bulbar paralysis; and pseudobulbar palsy.

Dysarthria

Dysarthria is a broad term that encompasses a variety of disorders of speech articulation. Dysarthria is a disorder of speech, not language. Dysarthric patients need not be aphasics, although many patients with

To borrow a book that the library does not own, click on Request button.
To submit your Interlibrary Loan request, type in your Bengal card number and last name. Click on Login.
Many of the request type choices below are for Interlibrary Loan or Document Delivery services. In most cases there will be a fee for these services.

Interlibrary Loan (ILL) is a process in which you obtain materials that are not in the Eli M. Oboler Library. Click here for ILL fee information.

Document Delivery is a process in which distance education students, faculty and staff can obtain materials that are in the Oboler Library collection. Distance education is defined as those individuals who do not attend classes on the Pocatello campus of ISU. Click here for Document Delivery fee information.

For a definition of the various request types, click here.

Important: Delivery of journal articles and book chapters is now via overnight delivery service. A handling fee will be charged per copy in the mail. Click here for more information.

Choose the type of request you wish to make from the menu below:
